

Addy Krom

Critique of Leonardo Rodriguez's Grocery Website

Things I liked:

- The website first brings you to the about page so that users immediately understand what the website is for, reduces any ambiguity
- i appreciate that the app is able to work on mobile as well as desktop, and on both it looks very nice
- i like that there is both a cross out grocery and delete grocery from the list, this gives users more options on what to do and it also looks nice
- i like how the text changes to red when the grocery expires
- i like how the groceries to buy symbol changes from a cow to a half eaten cookie when you click it, small things like this what a website fun to use
- i like how the style is consistent between all the page, this makes the website look professional
- This is especially useful as it combines a grocery list and expiration list in the same app. This will be useful as I can never keep track of expiration dates because there are too many things I own. With this application, I won't ever be in the situation where I want to eat some food I previously bought, but then realize that it's expired. This application will save me from a lot of heartbreak. it will also let me know what food i have and when i should eat it by

Things I think could be improved:

- Usernames can have spaces before and after, it may look a bit nicer if they are trimmed to remove leading and trailing white spaces
- It may make it user on users if instead of only being able to click on the small green grocery, the whole card acts as the button to add new groceries
- it may look nicer to change the text from "submit task" to "add grocery"
- when inputting the date, you can only put the date in when you click it for the 2nd time
- it would give users more functionality if they were able to edit the groceries they have, such as editing the expiration date or name in case they made a mistake when putting it in
- one thing you could for project 2 is add the ability for users to see their past groceries, have the ability to create different grocery lists, or make the ability for a recurring grocery that auto magically gets added to the groceries to buy list every week (or however often the user wants it)
- you could also add the ability to have a button that automatically adds an item to the grocery list once it expires. on top of this you could add a button to move expired food to the grocery list and another one to move items from the grocery list to the groceries to eat list

Conclusion: Overall this website is exemplary. I enjoy the features and the purpose that this website will fill. I do believe that this will help people save money by reducing the amount of time that people have to throw away expired groceries.